

POLITICAL ACTIVISM

I have been a political activist and contributor to the Victorian Liberal party since January 1990. I am of the belief that Politics is the actions and inactions between two opposing ideological parties that are associated with a region, an area or a country seeking power and influence.

These activities involve, planning, strategies, policies, campaigning techniques and the art of selling ideas and concepts to an unknown quantifiable society. I have been involved in every one of those stages throughout my thirty years as a political activist.

As a political activist, I am associated with the Liberal party and do what I can by compromising, moderating, developing, influencing, and where possible creating a platform in order to obtain obtaining the best of my target audience. The target audience may be at the now lost branch level, Federal/State Electorate Councils, State Assembly and State Council. I make maximum use of the articles within Abalinx and Associates and ensure that all are designed to meet the above characteristics. However, despite all good intentions, it is not my aim as the author to please the readers but merely to create an environment for a robust debate.

As members of a diverse society we all have our political biases and pints of view and many would not agree or see eye to eye on many subjects. The bottom line for myself as the author is that I am guided by three factors, namely that Australia as a nation comes first, then the family unit and finally loyalty to the organisation that I am affiliated or associated with. In this case the broad church of the Liberal party.

Academics, social scientists and activists who monitor the Politics do so from an observational point of view. Therefore institutions, elites, individuals, and communities all have markers or patterns of behaviour that identifies and separates them from each other. I rely much on my networks built over the past forty years, accumulating patterns of behaviour and monitoring changes in societal points of view. However my observations, generalisations or patterns of behaviour may not be perfect but they do assist me to predict trends and futuristic societal goals and ideological changes.

It is not and never has been my intention to denigrate any member of society but to contribute where ever possible towards a universal belief in Liberal conservative ideologies. Any reader who feels that they take umbrage to my articles, should first acquaint themselves with the Abalinx policies. I apologise in advance if any reader believes that they have been wrongly reported upon and to bring such grievances to my attention where the matter will be investigated and changes made where necessary. Contact details for such grievances can be made via email: abalinx@gmail.com and with the heading "GRIEVANCE".
